(We're back in the room we visited earlier. Cora and Sam, the teen guitarist, who clutches his axe nervously, have ended up next to each other.)

CORA

Hey.

SAM

Hey.

CORA

You OK?

SAM

It's not my blood. I'm not really sure whose it is.

CORA

(Beat.)

Sorry, that was a stupid question.

SAM

No—thanks for asking.

(Beat.)

In case, you know... I just want to say sorry.

CORA

For what?

SAM

For all the texts.

CORA

Yeah.

SAM

I'm surprised you didn't block me.

CORA

I did. Thirty-eight in one day was kinda my limit.

SAM

That's hilarious—well, not hilarious, but funny—not funny ha ha but funny weird—'cause that's exactly when I stopped. After the 38th. Anyway, I'm sorry for everything. My new therapist says I should write you a letter, so if we get out of here—

CORA

You don't have to write me a letter. I mean, you can, but you don't have to—not for me.

SAM

I'm going to. I'm sorry it took this for me to say I'm sorry.

(Beat.)

I bet Brian doesn't send you 38 texts in a day.

CORA

Seriously?

SAM

Sorry. I'm just a little freaked out right now, so I'm more manic than usual.

CORA

(Beat.)

I usually text him.

SAM

But he texts you back, right?

CORA

That's not your—

SAM

Sorry. You're right. I'll shut up. We're probably supposed to be quiet anyway, wait for the next announcement.

CORA

(Beat.)

He doesn't really text a lot.

SAM

Oh. But he texted you today, right?

CORA

He texted me back. He's in history. In 117. They're all OK so far.

SAM

That's good.

(Beat.)

I'd have texted you first.

CORA

I know.

SAM

I'd take your bullet.

CORA

Please don't say that.

SAM

OK.

(Beat. She leans her head against his shoulder.)
